The Transport Secretary instead muttered the EU laws he would like to see Britain KEEP when grilled amid Theresa May's announcement she will enshrine all existing EU regulations in to British law as Brexit kicks in.

Speaking on ITV's Peston on Sunday, he said: "We now have control of our laws. The bill gets rid of the supremacy of European law.

"Some thngs we want to keep, in the area of environment, area of workers rights and equally there are some things we will want to get rid of."

But, when Robert Peston quizzed Mr Grayling on what he would rid of, he fell short and appeared to avoid the question, saying: "What people want is a degree of certainty.

"You don't want dramatic changes with uncertainty.

"Over time we will change things, we will keep the things we want and get rid of the laws we don't want."

Mr Grayling's failure to name one Brussels law he would rid of, didn't go unnoticed with angry Twitter users, who criticised the Transport Secretary for not answering the questions.

One said: "What a total waste of time is Chris Grayling. Not a single answer to a single question, no personality, Mr Bland."

Another said:

"Chris Grayling unable to name 1 EU law he would repeal - we need protections for our workplace rights, environment, security #peston

"Chris Grayling asked what EU legislation's going to go, but gives examples of what we're going to keep #Peston," a Twitter user said.

Another added: "I can't bear it any longer, Chris Grayling on #Peston, anyone completely unbriefed could have said more."

Grayling said we need to "get on with" Brexit

The Prime Minister today announced she would trigger Article 50 - the formal process for leaving Brussels - by March.

Reacting to this news, Mr Grayling said: "Today's announcements are a staging post on the route towards triggering Article 50 and of course holding negotiations.

"We want to give some certainty, we can't just leave this to dribble out in to the future.
