"We are drowning, saturated with images, news, information, marketing, phone calls, text messages, noise, and color. We are overwhelmed with the conflicting demands of work, society, family, religion, and tradition. We are literally drowning, as the waters rise around us and the storms grow fiercer with the warming of the planet, a consequence of over-consumption by richer countries. As we gasp for air and struggle to survive, do we find time for love? I believe we do. Love – whether for our children, for our lovers, or for nature – is what drives us, keeps us afloat." - Monica Jahan Bose
